MUNCH OBLIGED

Miss Grundy stood before Principal Weatherbee and said, "Guess what?"

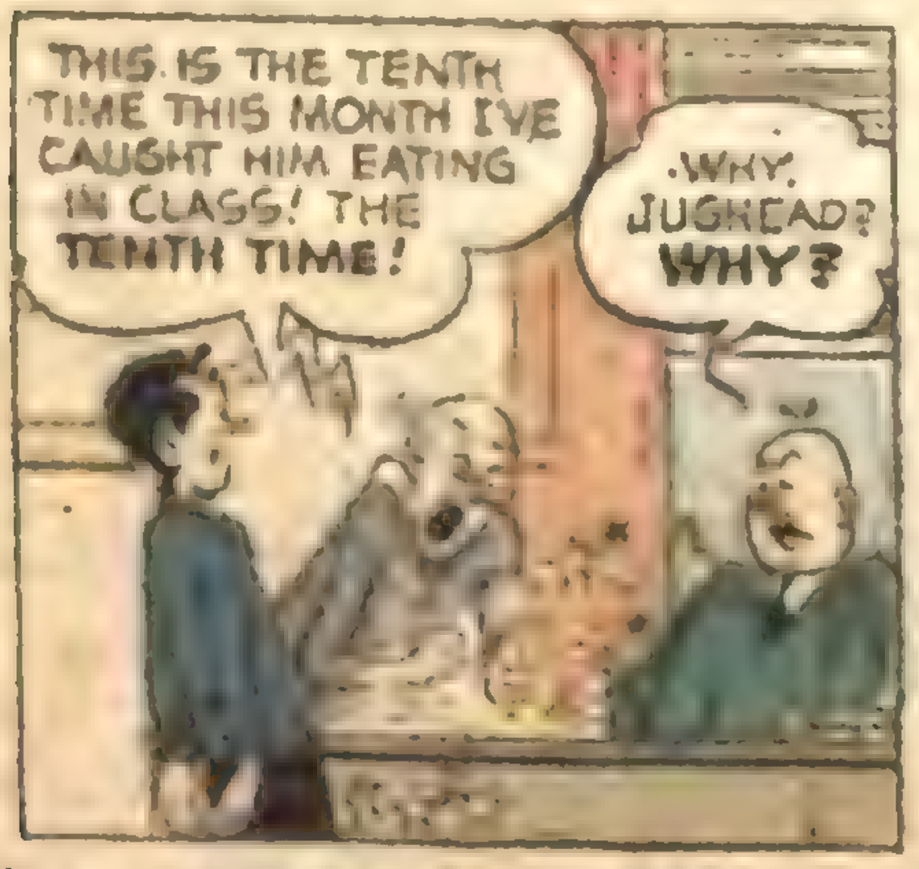
"A complaint," the Principal sighed.

"Guess who?"

"Jughead."

"Guess why?"

"Eating in class."



"Mr. Weatherbee, this can't go on. I'm at my wit's end. Almost every single day of the week, Jughead sneaks in a snack and munches in my class. What am I going to do with him? I've given him detention, extra homework, bad marks. Nothing helps. He still sneaks in snacks."

"Obviously punishment is no answer, Miss Grundy. We must use strategy. Cure him of this terrible habit once and for all."

"You mean remove his stomach?"

"No, no. Of course not. There's a much simpler way, Miss Grundy. And I know exactly how. Come with me."

Grundy followed Weatherbee back toward her classroom. Everybody was gone but Jughead who was busily munching away on an apple. When he saw the two of them walking in he swallowed the evidence hurriedly, core and all.

"Jughead," Mr. Weatherbee said, "I have something to tell you."

"I know," Jughead groaned. "More detention."

"No. Nothing like that."

"More homework?"

"Not that either."

"Come now, Jughead. Don't be flippant. All I want to tell you is that tomorrow, when you go to the cafeteria for lunch, you can order as much as you want, eat as much as you want and take as long as you want. And all this will be for free."

Jughead gazed stupidly at the principal. Miss Grundy didn't look much smarter. They both stood there with their bare faces sticking out.

Jug was the first to regain his voice. "Mr. Weatherbee, did I hear you right?"

"You heard me right. Now run along." Jughead ran.

"Mr. Weatherbee. Have you flipped?" Miss Grundy asked.

Weatherbee tapped his forehead significantly. "Psychology, my dear Miss Grundy. Psychology. By allowing Jughead to gorge himself he will make himself so sick he won't be able to look at food for weeks. Maybe months. Your munching miseries will be a thing of the past."

"Maybe," Grundy said dubiously.

"Not maybe, my dear lady. Positively. I know my psychology."

"But do you know Jughead?"

The following day when Jughead went to the cafeteria, both the principal and the teacher were there too. Jug started at the juice counter. There were eight glasses of juice when he got there. None when he passed. He had a little more trouble with the soup. The counter girl ladled it out herself. She waited for Jughead to hold out the usual soup plate. Jug brought forth a water pitcher. She emptied almost a half a tureen to fill it up.

"I . . . I . . . don't believe it," Weatherbee said. "It just isn't possible he can consume that much."

"Wait! You ain't seen nothing yet," Miss Grundy replied. "Watch him when he hits the main course counter."

Weatherbee watched. And watched. And watched. And he wasn't the only one. The whole cafeteria stopped eating to watch. Jughead stood at the main course counter for almost five minutes piling plate after plate on top of each other. The dishes kept going higher and higher. He stopped only when the topmost dish started to teeter precariously. Then he signalled to Archie and Reggie to come over and help him carry the whole tray to the table but not before he cautioned the dessert counter to stand by because was coming right back.

Then Jug sat down to eat. And how he ate. For three whole periods he just sat there with his mouth going, his adam's apple bobbing and his belt expanding. Weatherbee watched the entire proceeding, as though hypnotized. Finally there was nothing left but the tray. Jug wiped his lips daintily with a napkin. Looked at the food counter hesitantly as though he were going back. Shrugged. And left.

Weatherbee sat in his office for the rest of the afternoon dazed by the harrowing experience. "I saw it. But I still don't believe it," he kept saying over and over again. He was in such a state of shock he didn't even notice the memorandum which was put on his desk by the cafeteria manager to the effect that they had just incurred the greatest deficit in Riverdale High School's history and would need an extra appropriation immediately, or the whole school would not eat for a week.

And the next day, Miss Grundy stood before the Principal and said, "Mr. Weatherbee. Guess what?"
